

I just learned that certain banks are trying to exempt themselves from the restrictions surrounding Indiana's "Do Not Call" registry. This is absolutely unnecessary, since I know exactly how to contact my own bank if I have any questions, and I neither need nor wish to have them call me at home unless there is a problem of some kind with my account. I do NOT want to be solicited at home for any reason, which is why I put my name on the registry in the first place. My bank has plenty of opportunities to notify me of new products and services. I know this because they solicit me all the time through flyers, advertisements, posters, web ads on their home banking web page, newsletters they send with every statement, large buttons they force the tellers to wear, and even ads on the ATM screens. There is no justification for modifying any restrictions on the do not call registry, and certainly not for large commercial entities like banks -- and ESPECIALLY not credit card companies. The non-profit solicitations are bad enough, and I don't mind contributing to worthy causes. Credit card companies and banks would be an outrage.

Thank you for your time.

Sincerely,
Sally Grant
